Where to go and how to do it, by the insiders who know

MAKE A HOLIDAY A HOME

Coco Chanel resided at the Paris Ritz for 34 years; Tennessee Williams at New York's Hotel Elysée for 15. And with more than a 100 new hotel residence schemes launching last year alone, there's never been a better time to follow suit

Checking out is a miserable affair, so why not just stay? Right now, the luxury travel sector is riding the 'branded residences' train to a decadent utopia, where five-star stays turn into forever homes for those who can afford the luxury. The concept, which hinges on the sweet spot where hotel brands and property developers coincide, is set to skyrocket in the next few years as we usher in a new era of flexible living and working practices. Here's a taste of what's out there...

COSTA NAVARINO RESIDENCES

Stylish Greek brand Costa Navarino is adding residences, below, to its already much-loved collection of resorts across the southwest Peloponnese, with homeowners' sea-view panoramas protected for decades ahead thanks to strict environmental legislation. And, although privacy is remarkably high on the agenda, these residences are all for community spirit. costanavarino.com

NIKKI BEACH RESORTS AND HOTELS

You know it as the world's first luxury beach club, but Nikki Beach isn't just DJs and daiquiris. The group will, as of 2023, be adding residences to its repertoire. Launching adjacent to the newly opened resort in Montenegro, its occupants will lap up breathtaking views over The Bay of Tivat from a range of 65 one- to four-bed 'lifestyle units', above. nikkibeach.com

ROSEWOOD RESIDENCES

"Life without reservations" is how Rosewood advertises its luxurious live-in concept, which ranges from private ownership opportunities to long-stay rental agreements across the portfolio. 'Resident perks' are endlessly exclusive (such as VIP access to private islands and superyachts at Rosewood's residences in The Bahamas, for instance), while all residents can indulge in unlimited access to hotel amenities. rosewoodhotels.com
